

Battle of Trenton - Lexile 800

Name _____

In 1776, the Patriots were having a very tough time. The Continental Army, led by General George Washington, had lost many battles around New York City and suffered heavy losses. The soldiers were tired, and their spirits were low. They had to retreat through New Jersey and across the Delaware River into Pennsylvania. On the other side of the river, in Trenton, New Jersey, there were about 1,400 Hessian soldiers (German soldiers) who worked for the British.

General Washington planned to attack the Hessians on December 26, 1776, the day after Christmas. He wanted to attack from three different directions. The weather made things difficult because it was snowing and sleet, which slowed down the crossing of the river. The army had to use special boats to cross, and some men even fell into the river, but they were okay. By 4:00 a.m., the army was ready to march nine miles to Trenton. Along the way, Washington encouraged his soldiers, many of whom had no shoes and were hurt from walking in the snow.

The first shots of the battle were fired about a mile from Trenton, and the Hessians started to retreat. Washington made sure the Hessians couldn't escape to Princeton. Soon, more American soldiers joined the fight, and they set up cannons in the streets, causing a lot of damage to the Hessians. The Hessians were pushed back, and many of them were surrounded and forced to give up. Some tried to escape, but many were captured.

In the battle, only two American soldiers were killed, and five were hurt. However, many others got sick from the cold. The Hessians had 83 casualties, including 22 who died. The Americans captured 896 Hessians, although some managed to escape. All four Hessian leaders were killed. Even though the battle wasn't a huge victory in terms of strategy, it gave the Patriots a big boost and helped raise the soldiers' spirits, who had been losing hope.
